Grigorian started collecting Soviet posters in the mid 1990s, following a period collecting Soviet stamps. "My friends who weren't interested in my stamp collection were suddenly very interested in these," he said. Grigorian often picks up rare examples outside Russia, because western tourists bought and preserved them. Most coveted. "Some smaller prints may have come from a book of classic poster copies, for example. "You can't buy an original Lissitzky for $100, for example, so that's a warning sign," said Chisholm. Grigorian's main concern is not his collection's financial value, but ensuring it goes to a museum for future generations to enjoy after he has gone. "When you collect something, it's part of your soul, and I'm part of this period in history myself," he said. Sergo Grigorian has been collecting posters from the Soviet period for a decade. He lives in Moscow and London. Maria Lafont is the author of Pillaging Cambodia: Illicit Traffic of Khmer Art. Amazing collection of Soviet artwork. I highly recommend this book if you or an acquaintance enjoys Soviet Posters, or Cold War History. There is a large number of well printed and diverse pictures. The binding is also good, though it is glue on nylon, or something of that sort, I was hoping for something sewn, but it is durable and works just fine. Sergo Grigorian Collection. "This collection boasts more than 1000 Soviet political posters spanning the whole Soviet era from February 1917 to December 1991. Sergo Grigorian has meticulously constructed a collection of political posters, deliberately disregarding other interesting Soviet themes such as cinema, circus, theatre, sports and advertising (except those with clear underlying political meaning). In addition, Sergo Grigorian collects a wide range of literature and photographic materials related to the Soviet poster.
