Second, the account of English grammar offers benefits from the recognition that discourse is not a static product, but a constantly changing, negotiated process: as interaction proceeds, interlocutors build up and modify mental representations of their addresses, the context and the discourse itself. I am grateful to Lou Burnard for permission to use examples from the British National Corpus and to Antonio Moreno Ortiz for the use of the BNC Indexer; also to Miguel Treviño and Enrique Hidalgo for preparing the diagrams. I also want to thank my students and the many tutors and students who have contacted me by e-mail from Saudi Arabia, Iraq, China and other places to request information, to ask questions or make comments on particular points of grammar.
