When the Government of India set up an editorial Committee to author a history of the freedom struggle of India, he was its principal member. According to him the origins of India's freedom struggle lie in the English-educated Indian middle-class and the freedom struggle started with the Banga Bhanga movement in 1905. Yen quotes from Bodman's Spoken Amoy Hokkien as follows: "It is simpler to state that in Amoy Chinese there exists a structural contrast of plain versus nasalized vowels after all initials, and that b and m, l and n, and g and ng are merely variants of each other, depending on whether a plain or nasalized vowel or diphthong follows." Historian R C Majumdar, in his book Ancient Indian Colonies In The Far East, Vol. I. Champa, 1972, notes that in the 2nd Century CE, there was a kind of regeneration in the growth of the Chams in Vietnam. One cannot escape the many influences from India in the religion, culture and society of Champa. Drawing greatly from the Indian social structure, society in Champa was also divided into four caste-based groups i.e. Brahmana, Kshatriya, Vaishya and Sudra. Sanskrit learning also began in an early period in Champa. The Brahmanic religion greatly flourished in the Champa Kingdom, with the worship of Hindu gods Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva, the latter being the presiding deity in Champa. He was known and worshipped under various names. The history of Champa begins in prehistory with the migration of the ancestors of the Cham people to mainland Southeast Asia and the founding of their Indianized maritime kingdom based in what is now central Vietnam in the early centuries AD, and ends when the final vestiges of the kingdom were annexed and absorbed by Vietnam in 1832. One theory holds that the people of Champa were descended from settlers who reached the Southeast Asian mainland from Borneo about the time of the Sa Huá»nh culture

Catch the story of the ancient Kingdom of Champa in Vietnam that drew major influences and inspiration from India. Historian R C Majumdar, in his book Ancient Indian Colonies In The Far East, Vol. I. Champa, 1972, notes that in the 2nd Century CE, there was a kind of regeneration in the growth of the Chams in Vietnam. A rock inscription from the village of Vo-Canh in Vietnam talks about a Hindu king Sri Mara, who established a dynasty in the 2nd Century CE. One cannot escape the many influences from India in the religion, culture and society of Champa. Drawing greatly from the Indian social structure, society in Champa was also divided into four caste-based groups i.e. Brahmana, Kshatriya, Vaishya and Sudra. Sanskrit learning also began in an early period in Champa. Champa, ancient Indochinese kingdom lasting from the 2nd to the 17th century ad and extending over the central and southern coastal region of Vietnam from roughly the 18th parallel in the north to Point Ke Ga (Cape Varella) in the south. Established by the Cham, a people of Malayo-Polynesian stock. In the late 8th century the Chams were distracted by attacks from Java, but in the 9th century they renewed their pressure on the Chinese provinces to the north and the growing Khmer (Cambodian) Empire to the west. Under Indravarman II, who established the Indrapura dynasty (the sixth in Champan history) in 875, the capital of the country was moved back to the northern province of Amaravati (Quang Nam), near present Hue, and elaborate palaces and temples were constructed. What was their word for human? In other words, Southeast Asians preceded East Asians in the production of writing by at LEAST 100 - 200 years. What about the DEVELOPMENT of a unique writing system as opposed to the ADOPTION of a pre-existing foreign script? So I am not putting down Western or Far East Culture. I am merely saying that there is also greatness in ancient American culture, but we've been educated not to see it.) As some of the answers to this question have mentioned, Jared Diamond's excellent Guns, Germs, and Steel explains why accidents in geography gave the "Old Worlders" enough of an upper hand to conquer the New World.
