James montgomery flagg. Unconditional surrender of all tyrants! 1943, pen and ink on paper 28" x 22", signed and dated lower right HELP CHINA! Flagg grew up in the period when pen and ink ruled and printing technology was limited. When halftone printing was accepted as a reproduction process, Flagg created images of beautiful women, which supplanted the portrait artists of previous decades. The first book he illustrated was Yankee Girls Abroad(1900), with pretty gals abounding who were superficially similar to "The Christy Girl" and Fisher's "American Girl". Flagg's notion was yet another example of what Americans thought our women should look like. James Montgomery Flagg was an early master of pen and ink, but he was much more. Born in 1877, he grew up along with the reproduction technology that allowed artists to select the pen as the illustrative tool of choice. Charles Dana Gibson, who pioneered many of the techniques that Flagg would draw upon, was ten years older. From 1898-1900 Flagg studied painting in England and France. His first book was Yankee Girls Abroad (1900). That same year he had a portrait accepted to the Paris Salon, but he felt that painting was not his forte and returned to illustration. Above left is an image from the January 1902 issue of Harper's Monthly perhaps the only work he did for the magazine. Author:James Montgomery Flagg. From Wikisource.
