At its most basic, Christianity is the faith tradition that focuses on the figure of Jesus Christ. In this context, faith refers both to the believersâ€™ act of trust and to the content of their faith. As a tradition, Christianity is more than a system of religious belief. It also has generated a culture, a set of ideas and ways of life, practices, and artifacts that have been handed down from generation to generation since Jesus first became the object of faith. Christianity is thus both a living tradition of faith and the culture that the faith leaves behind. The agent of Christianity is the c...Â Modern scholars have located the focus of this faith tradition in the context of monotheistic religions. Early Medieval Philosophy: Ancient and Early Christian RootsSources Source for information on Early Medieval Philosophy: Ancient and Early Christian Roots: World Eras dictionary.Â The Greek tradition goes back to the fifth-century Greek Neoplatonist Proclus, while the Latin tradition has its roots in the third-century Neoplatonists Plotinus and Porphyry, who were part of an important intellectual circle in Rome.Â Written in prose and verse, the book asks why the evil prosper while the innocent suffer and concludesâ€œin an argument that echoes Plato, Aristotle, the Neoplatonists, and the Stoicsâ€œthat the only sure source of human happiness is in the life of the mind; that is, if one renounces the lures of wealth and power and seeks knowledge and virtue, one finds. They produced two sorts of works: theological and "apologetic;" the latter were works aimed at defending the faith by using reason to refute arguments against the veracity of Christianity.Â In his book Orthodoxy, Christian Apologist and writer G. K. Chesterton asserts that there have been substantial disagreements about faith from the time of the New Testament and Jesus.
